READ THE TEXT:

The night was beautiful; the moon was setting and the stars were shining brightly in a sky of deep azure. Not a breath of wind stirred the trees; the air was warm and heavy with the perfume of spring.

She was leaning on her elbow, looking at the sky; I was leaning next to her and watching her dream.

Then I raised my own eyes; a voluptuous melancholy seized us both. We breathed together, the warm perfume wafted to us from the garden; we followed, in its lingering course, the pale light of the moon which glinted through the chestnut-trees. I thought of that day when I had looked up at the broad expanse of the sky with despair. I trembled at the recollection of that hour; life was so rich now! [...]

I slipped my arm around my dear beloved's waist; she gently turned her head; tears were welling up in her eyes. Her body yielded, like a reed, her open lips fell on mine, and the universe was forgotten.

Alfred de Musset, The Confession of a Child of the Century, 1836.
